Is there a way to get inherited members of base class using derived class instance? A: Once you define A::instance (no initialisation), you're creating an object that lives until you explicitly destroy it, and you're storing a reference to that. So B::x is zero (initially) until you explicitly set it to something else. The solution is either to use an initialisation: A B::instance; or to make the definition of A::instance be part of the definition of A (or B): class A { A(); int x; ... }; A::A() : x(0) { } This can be a bit confusing, as it effectively declares a constructor for A, but where it would be expected to define a member initialisation list for x, instead it's defining an initialiser for the entire class. That's why it's an 'initialiser list' rather than an 'initialisation list'. Another thing you should note is
