Q: Repository Pattern using Dependency injection In my current project I've opted to use the repository pattern in my data access (DAL) layer. However, I am asking myself if I should be using my data access layer as a dependency into the domain model. A: Dependency injection is often used in the context of a loosely coupled architecture where the main things that need to change are the dependencies (even though the code itself remains the same). If you build your domain model as strongly typed data classes, you need not depend on any repositories directly. What you do need is interfaces for the data classes so you can build your domain model without knowing what data access layer is being used. For example, if you have a Person class with a name and a social security number, then for any of those types you might have an Address type, a Phone type, a Mailing address type, etc. If you stick to interfaces for your domain classes, you would have an IAddress type for an address and so on, and you can use those interfaces directly in your code if you need to. Then at the data access layer you can build a factory that will generate the right type of object for your domain class, through the use of an appropriate interface. So rather than having your PersonDataAccess class depend on a specific type of repository, it would depend on IAddressDataAccess, IPhoneDataAccess etc.

Biocompatible haloacetic acids: fabrication of derivatized polymers via palladium-catalyzed cross-coupling reactions.

4-(1,2,2-Trimethylhydrazin-3-yl)phenyl acetic acid (1) was used to synthesize haloacetic acids (HAA) via palladium-catalyzed cross-coupling reactions. Reaction conditions were optimized for haloacetic acid derivatives, resulting in benzyl and tert-butyl esters (7 and 8) in high yield. Alternatively, palladium catalyzed coupling of 1 and halides yielded HAA in high yield. The catalytic cross-coupling reactions were further applied to the synthesis of benzhydryl and tert-butyl esters (5 and 9).

1. Field of the Invention This invention relates to a closed-type hollow electronic musical instrument and, more particularly, to an electronic organ.

2. Description of the Prior Art In a conventional electronic organ, an organ keyboard is provided in an instrument casing with a plurality of keys each of which produces a note by actuating a hammer valve and the pressure and vibrating force of the hammer valve imparts a tone to a buffer. When a stop key is actuated, a buffer is driven to automatically stop its vibration. When the stop key is released, the pressure in the buffer is maintained in its stopped condition. The conventional electronic organ suffers from various disadvantages. The keys which are spaced from each other are unable to perform different tones at once, resulting in a monotonous tone. The stop key must be depressed throughout one tone but the hammer valves are generally spaced from each other. The tone therefore becomes monotonous. Also, since the buffer is merely a mechanical means, it is extremely difficult to control the tone at a desired pitch and to raise the level of the tone.

Altered psychosocial profile in patients with bipolar disorder with a high suicide risk. This study aimed to investigate the possible psychosocial and clinical characteristics of a group of patients with bipolar disorder, with a high suicide risk, in comparison with a group of patients with bipolar disorder, without such a risk. The sample consisted of 75 patients with bipolar disorder: 37 with a history of suicide attempts (high-risk group) and 38 without such a history (low-risk group). The control group consisted of 41 healthy subjects. The following demographic, clinical, psychosocial and treatment variables
