Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a laser-beam scanning optical device such as a laser beam printer, a copying machine, a facsimile machine, etc., in which a laser beam emitted from a laser beam source is projected onto a surface of a photosensitive drum, while the surface of the photosensitive drum is being scanned with the laser beam, thereby forming an electrostatic latent image on the surface of the photosensitive drum. 2. Related Background Art A laser beam printer is an example of a device using such a laser-beam scanning optical device. In the laser beam printer, a light beam emitted from a semiconductor laser diode serving as a laser beam source is shaped into a desirable beam spot using a collimator lens, an aperture, a cylindrical lens, and the like. The laser beam is deflected by a polygonal mirror serving as a deflecting means, and the deflected laser beam is projected onto a surface of a photosensitive drum as a latent image carrier in a scanning direction, thereby forming an electrostatic latent image on the surface of the photosensitive drum. If a user inadvertently operates the laser beam printer during the printing operation, a plurality of printed sheets will be output. The output printed sheets are usually discarded as waste. When the printed sheets are discarded as waste, the printed sheets cannot be reused. Since the paper is not used at all, the consumption of paper increases waste of resources. In view of this, Japanese Patent Application Laid-Open No. 5-329486 discloses a technique in which the printed sheets are stacked on a shelf arranged at a predetermined position in a printer, and the printed sheets are output when the user is to be informed of a printing start signal. According to this technique, the printed sheets, which are accumulated in the printer, are stacked, and the printed sheets are output together when the printing start signal is received. Thus, the user can be informed of the printing start signal without operating the printer. The technique disclosed in Japanese Patent Application Laid-Open No. 5-329486, however, requires a large-sized shelf in the printer, and inevitably increases the size of the printer.
