Sodium azide toxicity to Lissamphibia: a comparison of the effects of aquatic and terrestrial hydrid salamanders. Azide toxicity to 6 Lissamphibia species was determined for concentrations of NaN_3 ranging from 10^{-8} to 10^{-4} M in seawater and 0.1-1.6% NaN_3 in pond water. 2 amphibians were tolerant of high concentrations of NaN_3 (0.75 M NaN_3 in pond water) and survived at least as long as 6 months. The majority of species were intolerant of concentrations of NaN_3 greater than 10^{-4} M. Toxicity was not associated with age. Toxicity was similar in salamanders from ponds and streams and was not related to whether species were submersed in stagnant water. Toxicity was clearly related to survival, not the ability to regenerate damaged tissue. Salamanders surviving above-ground exposure to NaN_3 had more kidney abnormalities, as judged by histologic evaluation of the kidney, than those that survived exposure below the water surface.
