The purpose of this work was to determine the impact of an abrasive paste-brush on a stainless steel (SS) substrate compared to conventional SS hand instruments. Worn specimens after rotation (in vitro) of 60 s were tested in a mechanical wear test (NT-3, CSM, Switzerland) and analyzed by scanning electron microscopy (SEM). Specimens having a similar number of groove lines were selected from the mechanical wear test for chemical analyses. Specimens having a similar number of groove lines were selected for the chemical analyses. After 180 s, the number of groove lines was assessed and the extent of surface damage was evaluated using SEM. The wet abrasion rate (WAR) of the specimens was analyzed with the Pastatwin® device. The mean WAR of the paste-brush was 2.3 times greater than that of the conventional SS, whereas the mean WAR was similar for the other tested SS and ceramic carbide. The chemical analyses showed a higher concentration of iron, chromium, carbon, and phosphorus on the SS paste-brushed than on the conventional SS. For ceramic carbide, no difference was observed in surface condition. For steel and SS, groups with similar mean WARs (p>0.05) showed an increase in the number of grooves and a lower surface roughness. For SS, metal-to-metal contact was observed.Protective effect of hippocampal transplants in the rat: a comparative study of different transplantation techniques. Immunodepressed (IDs) rats received intracerebral grafts of dissociated or organotypic hippocampal tissues obtained from adult donors in three distinct transplantation techniques: hippocampal suspension (HISS), hippocampal de-afferentation (HD) and hippocampal de-afferentation + hippocampal de-afferentation (HDD). Each group contained four transplants placed in both hemispheres. Three control groups of rats: ID without transplants, ID with hippocampal suspension and ID with dissociated hippocampal grafts were included. Ninety to 120 days after grafting, the behaviour and N 570a42141b
