Automated determination of halothane in rat serum by gas chromatography with flame photometric detection. A rapid and reliable microcomputer-controlled gas chromatographic (GC) method was developed for the automated quantitative determination of halothane in rat serum. Serum samples were extracted with ether-saturated sodium chloride solution. Halothane was quantified by GC using a flame photometric detector after reagentless extraction of the serum samples. Serum was treated with 0.05 N perchloric acid to precipitate proteins and was centrifuged. The supernatant was transferred into a new tube for gas chromatographic analysis. Halothane was quantified by external calibration by comparing peak area (peak height) with a known concentration of halothane. The values of coefficients of variation and linear regression of the peak height versus the halothane concentration were 0.3% and 0.99, respectively.

Halothane concentrations in rat serum at different times after exposure of rats to a 2% halothane-oxygen mixture were determined by this method. Sustained cognitive-motor interference in the Bell-shaped age-related cognitive-motor skills and recovery process. Fifty-eight older adults (age 65 to 87), without history of motor impairment, received a series of six neuropsychological tests assessing three cognitive-motor abilities: self-performance, a perceptual-motor ability (the Pointing Game), and an executive ability (the Trail Making Test). All tasks were administered daily over a 12-day period, resulting in the emergence of a cognitive-motor interference and a reversal of interference on Day 11. The significance of the interference was assessed by comparing two groups of older adults based on their Day 11 performances: 25 subjects had been equally divided into a peak (P) and a trough (T) group based on their performances on the 'peak' tasks. The P group performed better on tasks with more difficult motor demands (e.g., the Pointing Game and the TMT) than the T group. Half of the subjects underwent a post-interference cognitive-motor retest, while the other half was retested at 6 months. The retests consisted of the six tasks administered during the initial interference. All subjects showed a significant performance gain over the 6 months, irrespective of the initial pre-interference performance. As predicted from the 'power-compensatory and learning-transfer' theory, the initial performance of the P group was the factor

By Joseph “Rocco” Ferranti PORK Bar (www.theporkbar.com) has three locations in the greater NY area, but the fourth location at 264 Broadway St, Allerton borough in the Bronx is slated to close by mid-October due to the landlord’s financial constraints, according to the company’s president, Gary Pizzolato. “When the landlord called us today, we were blindsided,” said Pizzolato. “We have been seeking other options, but there are none at the current time.” The Bronx location was opened in September 2014, at a cost of $1.3 million. By keeping the doors open, the company saved tens of thousands of dollars in rent, according to Pizzolato. As the company looks for a new location in the city, it has been eyeing at least three areas — Westchester County, the city of Kingston and the city of Albany. Pizzolato told ZH that the company has had some preliminary conversations with the landlord of the building it’s currently in and is keeping all of its locations open. In November, Pizzolato said the company was in the process of hiring 15 more employees and looking to increase its menu in response to the recession. The company recently started offering a pepperoni option as an everyday entree on its menu. Pizzolato said the company has been opening its Brooklyn and Queens locations for six years, while its Long Island location opened in 2015. “We have had great success in our three locations, and we are in a position to expand,” he said. “Hopefully we can find an affordable location in the city that will be attractive to current employees as well as prospective hires.” Pizzolato said the decision to close the Bronx location “is not to lay off anybody,” adding that many of the employees have been with the company for as long as 10 years.
