a significant effect on universities' emergence in different parts of the world. In this regard, globalization represents an invaluable tool that in different ways enables and shapes developments within higher education. In the case of Uganda's situation, the obstacles that constrain the development of higher education in the country are obvious and palpable. Universities, and even more important, universities' functions as providers of quality higher education, must be addressed as a necessity for the country. The condition of universities has often been termed an issue of Africanisation, suggesting that the university space should be located in different parts of the continent, as a way to achieving and sustaining the higher education in African countries. Higher education has an important role in shaping social, economic, and political development as a new global phenomenon. Collapse of the “economy of practical jokes” in Thailand Thai culture is famous for the practical joke.

Such jokes are very common in the classroom and at social gatherings, but the practice is disappearing. A social change is taking place in Thailand. The collapse of “economy of practical jokes” Until recently, people were considered men of honor when it came to “punching” in Thailand. If you were invited to someone’s house, you had to accept an invitation to a party. On the other hand, if someone punched you, you had to get revenge. There were many occasions when the punch was accompanied by a joke: “What do you call a cat that runs after a mouse?” “An honest man”. This was the “economy of practical jokes”, which could be regarded as a traditional manly way to take revenge against a party that you feel has not welcomed you. The past 30 years have seen a gradual decline in the use of practical jokes in Thailand. When children have grown up, they are not involved with such jokes anymore.

Even if a child witnessed a practical joke, he would never do it, because he may consider it bad manners. Although it is quite common for older people
