Arkin brings back the days of maneuverable starfighter combat, but with a modern twist. You take on fast-paced dogfights that use unique energy routing and upgrade options to push your ship to its breaking point. Arkin uses the same engine model as the Sirius-X, the flagship of the TDF fleet. As such it can use any Sirius-X components, weapons, hull, and canopy. Arkin has been in full development since September 2011; two years of hard work have gone into the development of the Orion. Arkin's developers, and designers have been challenging themselves to create a true 4X experience with the impact that will have on the young industry that is the 4X genre.

Arkin is currently available on Steam Greenlight A: I haven't played it, but on the surface the website looks to be based in the Star Citizen universe (which I am familiar with). From the official site: Arkin is a 4X deep space shooter in which players assume the role of a squadron leader. 4X seems to be like Civilization. Developers from Los Angeles-based crowdfunding platform Star Citizen are creating the game. Star Citizen is a sandbox-style video game where gamers can live out their dreams by becoming a celebrity in space. 7 9 9 9 + 1 4 1 . 1 1 8 9 . L e t o = 1 3 4 - w . What's new:

Greetings ladies and gents, you know where this is heading, by now...anyway, today we are back on the more serious side of Heretical game development with more previews from the upcoming Gratuitous Space Battles Anthology. It's the last starfighter - it must be said - that we present to the readers this week. Being the last preview and all, that's no exaggeration. Let's begin with the concept art. Allegedly this'un is a prototype for the X-Wing and it's from the bad-ass guy, Sho Rat that posted it on his Twitter. This means it is likely not very good and I wouldn't dare hope it to be taken seriously, but it's concept art is amazing nonetheless. So lets see what it looks like! The designer on this project is a Mr. Simon Kjelsrud from UK - from his website we read that he is the founder of the rather interesting party game Space Ritchie, which is an adaptation of the board game "Six Degrees of Kevin Bacon" for between 1 and 8 people. He also designed the Fate Moratorium card game. So far so good. Nice starting points for a wargame is always good because there is nothing worse than a sketchy picture. Now lets see what becomes of it! The idea is that the player controlling the prototype is in the cockpit of the starfighter and is controlling the ship itself. Hence you have: Two principle controls the player has to deal with: The single torpedo weapon mounted in the floor of the cockpit The thrusters, i.e. the weapons that allow the fighter to move in the space This is on top of a codebase with maybe some AI in the mix which is not yet determined Something like this? Well then... This is probably one of the most interesting things that are currently popping up in the hobby space. Both a copy of X-Wing and a comparable set of rules is going to be released by Fantasy Flight Games and though the allure may seem questionable (haven't they released a bad wargame before?), it may be a very nice starting point. What we are about to show is what that will look like. As you can see this is a mere rough draft. Mr. Kjelsrud had to retouch images a
