Understanding Neotoma albigula nest building behaviors in relation to light conditions and plant type was conducted in a laboratory arena and in a field trial. In the laboratory, measurements were made under two light intensities: light filtered through foliage and diffuse light and we found that N. albigula exhibited a preference for the diffuse light condition. Although a previous field study reported no preference, in that study, a single light intensity was used. In this study, we found a preference at both light intensities, indicating the importance of light intensity. Light intensity was also shown to influence the size of the nests that the termites built. Most nests were of a size in a range that is associated with a reduction in damage (1.0-2.0 cm radius). This is of interest to pest control because small nests are often considered as an indicator of termite control success. We also measured termite preference for host plant types and found that N. albigula favored deciduous over coniferous pine and the latter over herbaceous plants. However, we found no preference for host plant species, suggesting that N. albigula has at least a partial preference for a nest that could be considered for termite control. This partial preference suggests that N. albigula is unlikely to termite-proof a building.[@CR45]^ . To establish identity of the dominant, persistent pathogenic species in the lungs of fed flies, we measured the relative abundance of pathogenic bacteria in the guts of flies that were alive at 1, 2, 3, and 4 days after lethal challenge. This approach was used because bacteria establish successful infections in the gut
