Players will feel the most fluid, natural player movement in any game ever, with the ability to tackle, intercept and even shoot from any angle in the game. Players also have the option to choose to train in the HyperMotion Engine, as well as to see their real-life movements reflected in their game. The best part about the technology is that players can train in the engine and with the game, and get the best of both worlds. There is a difference between the real-life and in-game movements. The in-game player movements will be improved in small and big ways, but the real-life movements will always be the closest you can get to the real game. When the game is being played, the players will have the option to choose to play the game with their real-life movement or with the game-mechanical movement of the game and a control system will be implemented to allow players to play with either one to their liking. All the game mechanics are the same as what we know with FIFA 21, but there will be fewer natural feelings in certain game elements. The player will know which game actions are different and which ones are the same. There is new animation work for better player action and facial animation, as well as some gameplay actions that will have a different feel to them. These tweaks have been done based on recommendations from our community. HyperMotion in FIFA 19 was not always the best, but it has improved a lot in FIFA 22. The ratings for the players and positions will be changed based on how they play during matches in FIFA 22. Ratings are back up after a long time and we are very happy to be bringing them back into the game. Rating is not just one thing and there is no checklist that I have to check to see if I am rating a player. It is a subjective process of how I feel that a player's performance and rating is in a game. I rate players differently in different matches. I know that all the ratings are not the same and I will do everything I can to make sure they are as close to equal as possible. One of the things that you can expect from FIFA 22 is that we are bringing back the best ratings. Of course, the ratings will always be subjective, but we are using a lot more data in this year's ratings and if someone is playing well, they will

Game developers are raising concerns that the way some U.S. companies participate in China's restrictive-competition laws will limit their international growth. Sony Corp.'s PlayStation 3 and Microsoft Corp.'s Xbox 360 released in China in 2010, a year after the hardware was released in the United States. That year, the game consoles were subject to strict security and data-protection standards, which many Western software developers complained made them difficult to produce. This year, the new PlayStation 4 and Xbox One will both be sold in China, but they also contain chips made by U.S. companies, including Qualcomm Inc., Nvidia Corp. and ARM Holdings, which were not covered by Beijing's orders. As a result, many U.S. game companies are being given the option of not releasing games with Chinese-made chips in China, because they claim the Foreign Trade Law under which the Chinese rules were issued doesn't apply to U.S.-origin products. If the U.S. game makers go ahead with a Chinese launch, they must provide a local value-added reseller, or VAR, which has its own set of strict security standards. Such a model is seen as more restricting than the existing non-Chinese release method. "[This is] an attempt to incentivize U.S. game companies to withhold releases in the market," said Sun Chang, head of Beijing-based Chinese game developer Rudo Mango. MGM Resorts International Inc. announced in June that it will not sell its Star Wars-themed casino in the northwestern city of Ningxia, saying China's Foreign Trade Law applies and its products had to be delivered to a local VAR.
