HyperMotion Technology has been added to FIFA's player models. Players naturally show the movement, power, and intent that we would expect from these unique characters. The player models use motion capture data to give players dynamic, realistic and elastic animations. Players can sprint and accelerate with improved control during fast running. As a result, players in a sprint sprinting mode now accelerate faster and for a shorter duration compared to previous FIFA titles. Players will now roll effectively with all of their movements, giving them new tactical options in and around the box. Players will also use this movement to change speed, receiving the ball before they would with the traditional sprinting animation. In addition, players are now able to make breakthrough runs and perform cutbacks. One of the most noticeable effects introduced with the new Motion Tech animations are the "elasticity" of the player models. As seen in the video above, elasticity is hard to see as a change on the surface, but it is a significant shift in the way that you perceive and interact with the game. A player runs towards the ball. As he approaches, the upper body twists and contorts to perform the play. During the middle phase, the player can push away the ball by twisting his hips, absorbing the contact, and without having to complete a proper tackle. They will be much harder to catch in open space because you can now twist your hip as you approach them, making it difficult to catch them in stride. Another extremely noticeable effect of the HyperMotion Technology is the increased dynamic of the game with the new tackles. The bruising hits used to create a highlight and a feel of contact in a tackle were done in a way that perhaps appeared unrealistic to fans. Now, however, you can feel the contact - a light thud as you hit the ball carrier. The game allows the user to apply power and direction to the contact in more ways than previous titles. In the case of a full body collision, your player will flex his arms to absorb the blow, then he will reach for the ball. The skill moves into the second phase and he has to physically get control of the ball. This new tackle allows more variation to the game, similar to the luscious-looking soccer celebrations in the new FIFA Ultimate Team. As for the midfielders, they can now
