This article documents and showcases some of the AI improvements implemented into the game. The improvements were achieved by implementing (and then validating) different types of intelligent agents that are not simply mapped to an existing skill tree. The technological improvements have been applied to all skill trees that match the type of agent (e.g. set-piece and on-ball). Validation A key part of any FIFA game is the AI. The FIFA code base and the actual implementation of the AI for each franchise varies. However, the base AI scripts implemented in the Xbox One and PC versions of the game are the same. The FIFA code base is then further enhanced with AI-specific scripts that give the game the ability to deal with specific situations. These scripts are then validated and tested by the game engine before being released to the development team for more robust testing. In 2015, when the HyperMotion Technology was first introduced, both the Xbox One and the PC versions of the game were still using the very same AI validation scripts. These scripts were then updated and tested in 2016. In September of 2016, a new version of the validation scripts, specifically for the Xbox One version, was introduced. The game had been on hold following the introduction of the new game engine. This new version was only tested on the Xbox One for a short time before the game was finally released in March of 2017. In October of 2016, the game released on PC and Xbox One with the new HyperMotion Technology. Since then, the validation scripts for the game have been updated and are being integrated into the game. This means that all agents are now undergoing robust validation tests. However, because of the number of modifications to the script, some aspects of the game will need to be further assessed. End Game Finishing The end-game validation tests include testing the player kits and checking the over-albedo and proper decay of player markers when the game is paused. End Game Finishing is a process whereby the player kits are checked for conformity after the game is paused for the entire match. Here are some screenshots: Late-Time Defending The new HyperMotion Technology allows the game engine to provide better information to the defenders regarding the positioning of the attacking players. If the attacking team is in a formation with several attackers in the box, the defending player may want to exploit any gap between the defense and the ball in order to
