Image and video enhancement is an ill-posed problem due to the linear nature of the processing of the image. Most of the existing methods use image/video enhancement methods are based on the theory of signal processing or image restoration. However, none of these methods can explain the different cues used by human beings to perceive and judge if an image/video is enhanced or not. In this paper, we propose a biologically based image/video enhancement algorithm for image/video processing. In this method, we have used the retinotopic mapping and structure-from-motion (SFM) as a novel approach to explain the different cues used by human beings to perceive and judge if an image/video is enhanced or not. SFM is used to explain the object information in an image. The retinotopic mapping has been used to explain the spatial smoothness of an image. We have exploited these cues to enhance an image/video by replacing them with their corresponding calculated values. This enhancement technique has been tested with different benchmarks. Our algorithm shows a good performance with various low-quality image/video benchmarks such as Scrambled image, Queue-based image, Jitter-based image, and Reduced image. Compared with conventional enhancement algorithms, our algorithm has shown better performance in almost every benchmark.
