an Amazon Kindle from your PC. Skeptics of improved nuclear technology, including those who are concerned about radioactive waste, often point out that current nuclear reactors generate more energy than they use. This seems valid in principle, although not much else: the current nuclear reactor that uses the most energy is the Monju, rated at 1077 Megawatt-Days (MWe), followed by the CHART reactor rated at 750 MWe; these two are far too small to consider as power plants. But the burning of nuclear fuel releases much more energy than the fuel itself. The energy released by nuclear fuel is about 135 times that of what goes into the reactor for a given period of time; this is because the neutrons from the reactor fission a large mass of uranium, creating far more energy than is needed just to get the uranium (and then thorium or plutonium) that the reactor needs. If all reactors went off the grid, just one day with a 100-megawatt net nuclear reactor could generate all of the energy that the world uses in a year. But this means that, for many years, a nuclear reactor would be not only producing energy, but also generating waste that would be accumulating in many cooling ponds and then warehouses. Nuclear reactors already produce, as a fraction of energy usage, more than electricity: they produce multiple other useful products, such as medical isotopes and fertilizer for farming. The energy goes into materials that produce useful products. These other products are not the main waste stream; that is what water, steel and concrete are for. But you could envision a future where nuclear reactors were the only energy source left; and then the problem would be that there would be no longer an energy source. It would be necessary to find a way to convert the nuclear reactor waste, which is already becoming a significant b7e8fdf5c8
