Microsoft Webmatrix, a web application development toolkit for Windows.IceCube is designed to record the origin of ultra-high-energy cosmic neutrinos, the ghostly particles that hit the Earth from beyond the solar system. IceCube's search for the cosmic neutrinos will most likely prove its worth by finding a weaker, extraterrestrial source for an IceCube-identified high-energy neutrino that might be hitting Earth. In a long-awaited statement, IceCube detected one of these neutrinos of cosmic origin on Aug. 31, 2013, from the constellation of Virgo. The neutrino's energy is 2 PeV, or petaelectronvolt, which is more than 10 times as high as the highest-energy neutrino ever detected, which had an energy of about 1.4 PeV, or petaelectronvolt. (The "p" means to the power of 10 and the "e" stands for the elementary charge of electricity, about 1.602 times 10⁻¹⁸ coulombs.) "The elusive cosmic neutrino has been the holy grail of high-energy neutrino astrophysics," Tim Peierls, a Nobel laureate in physics at the University of Oxford, told Space.com. Peierls is one of the co-discoverers of neutrinos that had their origins in the universe's most energetic processes, such as the explosive death of massive stars and black holes and colliding supernovas. A sighting of this kind on record was possible only because of IceCube's three-dimensional framework, which enables it to seek and record high-energy neutrinos of all origins. As a result, they were able to make the second most energetic neutrino of all time, the first of which was the candidate announced in February 2013. "The IceCube detection of the PeV neutrino and subsequent discovery of an associated gamma-ray emission is a major milestone for IceCube and demonstrates that the instrument can successfully detect cosmic neutrinos as predicted by the Standard Model of physics," said Olaf Reimer, a senior IceCube member at the IceCube home base at the Max Planck Institute for Physics in Germany, in a statement. The business is an event management and service provider. So far they are running on a site using Drupal7 and have a very basic functionality. They have a call to action to sign up as an event handler and that's it. My first thought was to rewrite this existing site using Drupal8 and just adding few other features. I'm interested to hear your thoughts and experience regarding this. What is the 'best' approach? How would you suggest approaching it? A: We had an experience of rewriting our current website to Drupal 8 a few months ago. We used symfony2 as our framework. The most painful was to create a new framework, change our way of thinking (we have a old project, developed in symfony1). Migration was a nightmare. We ended up with a functional website with a few bugs. We had to do a lot of coding ourselves, there was no time to test and verify. Of course we can stay with the old site until we have enough time to migrate to the new Drupal 8. It is not a simple task to migrate your entire website with legacy code to a new one. And you are not going to have the time to fix everything you left with the last version of Drupal 7 and even less time to migrate again to Drupal 8 if you have a big web application with many pages and features. So, my first recommendation is: DO NOT rewrite if you have a really complex website. If you need to update a simple feature, use Drupal 8 and make the legacy version a module you can later put in the website container. If you want to understand how to use a framework instead of modifying it, I suggest you to read
