Turkey's top opposition leader Mehmet Zeyneloglu is demanding the country's officials to give up their offices, asserting that they are all in 'irreconcilable conflict' with President Recep Tayyip Erdogan, adding that the refusal to do so will only mean the country's 'collapse.' "It is not that we demand resignation. We demand that the officials give up their offices. Those who continue to work there do not concern us, they are not our target. The target are those who continue to work", Zeyneloglu told the Bilgi University's editor-in-chief Ayhan Bilgen in an interview published on Sunday. Read more "What is going on in Turkey today is called the collapse of the state, not a coup", he added. He reiterated that his party, Good Party, will not tolerate coercion and makes no distinction between "their lives and work," saying that they "will continue their fight on this battleground." Zeyneloglu said that after the Dec. 17 failed coup attempt, the authorities "should have protected the army," reiterating that his party expects "that the army to take action and protect their employers, their jobs." "That makes them our target," he added. Indeed, the government has not viewed the main opposition party, Republican People's Party (CHP), an organization the US government has branded as 'terrorist,' as a serious competitor. On the contrary, president Erdogan is convinced that all the parties must be considered an 'enemy' of the regime. In light of Turkey's crushing military operation, described by some as a 'warsawing' attack, Zeyneloglu called on army veterans and opposition politicians at large to stand together against the regime

What's new in Overture OST:

Test Lunar Flight Test was a United States Air Force project that attempted to fly a Lunar Module to the surface of the Moon. It was announced in January 1968 and the contract was awarded in July 1968. It was intended to be a precursor to the Apollo lunar lander in that the first "Lunar Surface Vehicle" (LSV) would land on the moon and its ejection seats would allow the crew of two astronauts to return to lunar orbit by entering the descent stage. The first spacecraft would be named, and the two astronauts would be Lieutenants Daniel Maynard and Michael Collins. Blue V was used for the first. In the second and third test flight Blue V was simply called LRV. Blue V was the first piloted LM to the lunar surface and directly demonstrated the feasibility of that test. It accomplished all its mission objectives of three orbits around the moon, one close flyby and descent to the surface. The last step demonstrated the ability of the craft to function in a vacuum for 24 hours. The first test, using the shortened Blue V as a stationary mockup, was successful. By the time of the first manned LLV test flight, subsequent ones used the command module to effect the descent from the lunar orbit to the surface. Blue V was to be followed by. It was a closer-in version of the LRV tested in the second flight. In the event, only one flight occurred before cancellation of the project. Lunar Orbit Rendezvous In 1965, NASA and the USA were considering using the Lunar Orbit Rendezvous concept, by flying a unmanned spacecraft around the Moon, receding into space until it reached a place where it could place itself into a trajectory to the surface of the Moon. The second spacecraft would be launched from the Earth and meet the first spacecraft at a lunar rendezvous point, and would then take over. The United States Air Force and NASA had worked on a similar concept, the Boeing B-50 Hustler, but changed their minds in 1966, replacing Hustler with the International Geophysical Year spacecraft. Since the International Geophysical Year spacecraft would be using the Earth for its return trajectory, there was no rendezvous point. This left no way to meet the first spacecraft when it arrived at the Moon. After President Johnson canceled the Manned Spaceflight program Apollo on 29 July 1966, the Air Force became interested in continuing the lunar mission. The Air Force had already agreed to fly a crewed mission to orbit the
