Turbochargers are used to provide engine boost in an internal combustion engine. For example, turbochargers are used to increase the amount of oxygen provided to the combustion chamber(s) of an engine. The turbocharger comprises a turbine in which exhaust gas discharged from the engine is passed, causing the turbine to rotate. The turbine is connected to a compressor in which the turbine exhaust gas is used to move air from the intake tract of the engine into the exhaust tract. The amount of boost produced by a given turbocharger is a function of the volume of exhaust gas passing through the turbine, which in turn is a function of engine speed and engine load. Turbocharger systems are known to be provided with a spring mounted in the turbine housing. The spring holds the turbine wheel or turbine rotor axially against the housing. This prevents the turbine from moving axially in the event that the power supply to the turbocharger malfunctions. It is also common to mount the turbine housing on a shaft with bearings, for example, in order to prevent the turbine housing from moving axially with respect to the shaft. However, in the event that there is a failure of the power supply to the turbocharger, the spring or shaft bearings are unable to prevent the turbocharger housing from moving axially. If the housing moves axially, the turbocharger turbine rotor could come into contact with components in the exhaust system of the engine, possibly damaging the turbocharger and the engine.

Hundreds of thousands of people crowded the streets of big cities across the country on Wednesday to demand further action on climate change and its effects on the environment. The first of hundreds of "people's climate strikes" organised by school students across the world took place in Auckland, New Zealand. Organised by the New Zealand Youth Climate Coalition, over 5000 people took part in the protest in the Auckland CBD. Speakers from New Zealand's youth Parliament praised environmental activism and called on politicians to acknowledge the crisis. With the New Zealand government demonstrating little ambition in tackling the climate crisis, the activists demanded action as well as they rallied for a just transition to a low-carbon economy. Organisers for the Auckland strike said it was a "huge success" with "unprecedented numbers." While one woman told the protesters: "This is the first time that I've been in a crowd of this size - this is huge." Greta Thunberg, the 16-year-old climate change activist from Sweden, was one of the main organisers of the global climate strikes. Her speech in Auckland was watched by hundreds of thousands of people around the world. "The climate crisis is the biggest threat of our time, and it is much bigger than anyone expected it to be," she said. "I am here today not just to tell politicians that we are going to continue to strike, we are going to keep striking, until we get this working," she added. "I am here because we can do it, we must do it." Greta said the world was at a "critical point" in which the political class had failed to deal with the crisis, adding that this was "the moment we have all been waiting for." A big part of what was striking about Greta's speech is that she is not afraid to advocate for people power in the face of a system that is failing to protect those on the frontline of the crisis. "This is the moment for us to begin to organise against this system that we are all in," she said, adding that protesters must “take back the power.” She said: “It is time for us to move from merely protesting into taking direct action.” And Gret
