PhotoShop Express PhotoShop Express (www.photoshop.com/express/) is an easier and less expensive version of Photoshop. It uses a command-based editing system that allows users to select a variety of editing options, including using filters. As the name suggests, PhotoShop Express is limited to certain features. It is basic and inexpensive but does offer the same overall feature set as Photoshop. Figure 8-4 shows a comparison of PhotoShop Express and Photoshop. 1. Select "View" 2. Click "Display" The Display preferences dialog box will open. 3. Click "Show Layers," and then click "Lock/Unlock All Layers" You may need to lock/unlock layers on either side of the figure to see all the layers. Photoshop makes life easier by automatically hiding all the layers you don't want when you start, but PhotoShop Express is a little more challenging because it does not hide the layers automatically, and you need to click "Lock/Unlock All Layers" in the Layers Panel to hide or show them. 4. Click OK Figure 8-4: PhotoShop Express is a basic application with a restricted feature set. PhotoShop Express uses command-based operations and does not have a layer-based system. If you want to drag an image file into the application to make a composite, you cannot. You have to first save the file into a format that PhotoShop Express can read. You can use the History panel to review your changes. Click the arrow next to the History panel and select the History panel tool (Figure 8-5), or you can select it directly from the floating toolbar (Photoshop CS6 or CC). Figure 8-5: Review changes in the History panel. If you decide you want to keep the changes you have made to an image, click the "Wrap Around" button and then click the Commit button, which is located in the panel and is highlighted in the figure. You can also immediately close your document.

. You do what you do, and what others do. They just do it better. What do you need? Maybe your biggest need is a quiet place away from the clutches of work and the world. Maybe you need a cut of art to adorn your home. Maybe you need a gift for a loved one. Maybe you need a journal or book to hold you up when times are tough. Maybe you need a free pass to the nearest local hot springs to soothe your soul. Maybe you need a train to California or a bus to New York. Whatever it is, you do what you do, and what others do. You'll find it, or something that works for you. Growth is optional, but dying sure is easy. Keep on keepin' on. Coastal Styles Geoff's week in stories is complete! You can catch up on all of the different chapters and the details in the blog. Hopefully, it's helped you out in your own creative process! This time of year I'm mentally sending good tidings to two of my favorite creative folk – Boz Morgenstern and Anders Nienkratz. Both of these guys, in their own ways, tell a hell of a story. Neither one of them have a book out this month, but both have written a collection of short fiction, and short story collections, to date. So, my spirits perk up a bit. Boz has long been a favorite writer of mine. I love the core themes of creativity and spirituality that underpin his writing, and how he puts these into fascinating fictional landscapes. He's also a great writer of character, both in his own stories, and the characters he weaves into his short story collections. I'm on the last chapter of his latest short story collection, Voices from the Curve. And, I'm excited to say, it's a VERY good one. (The story is called "The Way Things Fall." I don't want to give anything away.) Anders hasn't posted a new story in a while, but he dropped a new collection recently. My wife read it and liked it a lot. Anders is in my opinion one of the most underappreciated storytellers in the history of short fiction – he's a master

Q: Can you compare a value in a class to a const-qualified member of that class? Is this valid? struct A { const char* member; }; A my_a; my_a.member = "something"; int main() { if (my_a.member == "something") { // do something } } I'm asking this because I wanted to allow std::string member, but I'd prefer to just use char*. I understand that this won't work because member is just a plain char* and not std::string, but I was wondering if it's valid. A: my_a.member is of type const char *, and const char * is convertible to const char *const (or even const char *) but not to const std::string &. My guess, though, is that you'll not like the behavior of your program for this reason: there's no implicit conversion of a pointer-to-const-char to a pointer-to-char: char *a; std::string const &s = a; //doesn't work: what do you expect? if (s == "hello") { // do something } //in any case, operator== can't be defined for pointers-to-const-char //but it can for pointers-to-const-char-that-are-non-const //so the compiler wouldn't need to disambiguate A: No, you can not. You can check that two values are equal by using the == operator, and you can check that the pointer and the string are the same by using the == operator. But you can not check if two string are equal using the == operator or the strcmp() function. Long-term care plans would be a cost-savings measure for seniors and the state, experts say The state's recent legislative effort to expand Medicaid coverage for some low-income people could add up to $2 billion a year in revenue for Rhode Island, according to an economic analysis released Monday. The paper, prepared by the nonprofit Advanced Health Systems, looked at the cost savings to both the state and the elderly and disabled by expanding Medicaid. A long-term care service plan is one of the
