I'm trying to build a docker compose file that will include 2 images and some configuration files. I'd like to know how can I add a whole directory (where all files that I want to include are located) to a docker compose file. Suppose that I have such files: dist: image: some-image:latest files: - path: somedirectory/hello.txt content: Hello Then if I want to add just hello.txt to compose file, I should be able to write something like this (I know that this won't work but just show you the idea): path: somedirectory/hello.txt content: Hello Is it somehow possible to do that? I am using Docker Compose v3. A: You can mount your directory to the container using a mount directive. You can see it in action here, but the key part is the content option: - { path: somedirectory/hello.txt, content: "Hello" } This will then cause the specified path to be mounted into the container's filesystem as somedirectory. Regarding the compose file, it is best practice to use versioned compose files. This will cause a new compose file to be generated every time you change it, and you can pass in variables to the file using the environment key. For example, you can create a compose file on 0cc13bf012

I know these programs exist but what is the point and if I wanted to make my own do I have to know how to code the program itself? A: The point of a translator is twofold. First, people can use the same language to write code in, whether it be a lexer, grammar, interpreter or anything else. Second, there is a vast amount of automatically generated files that a translator can create. Most text editors will automatically detect syntax, find references to other files or any other language element. Depending on the project, you will need to find your own exact uses. Q: How to do this in Postgres? I'm trying to create a trigger on a table that will automatically append a new integer value to a column in that table. I have a table called "projects" with a column called "edges" and another called "nodes". I would like to create a trigger on "projects" that will add an integer value to the "edges" column based on the value of "nodes" (number of people in the project). So if "nodes" is less than 5, then "edges" should only contain 5 values. If "nodes" is 6 or more, "edges" should add a new row each time. I can write the part of the code that will do this for one row but I don't know how to do this for each row. I tried using CTE but couldn't get it to work. I also tried using a do-while statement but it gave me errors. If anyone could help me out that would be great. Thank you in advance. UPDATE The following code is what I managed to write. My table projects is named "projects" and my table "nodes" is named "people". This is how I've been thinking to do it. CTE - Find the number of people in the project Compare this value to the number of people that are in the project. If the value is less than 5 then
