The biggest problem was the ruling council of the people of Tyrian, they were trying to put an end to the over whelming power of the Titans. And the Titans were doing their best to evade the council. The council got some hints about the location of the secret landing place of the biggest and most powerful Titan. The council decided to send 2 representatives to the secret landing place where they would try to confront the Titan if they would come. The representatives were supposed to find out which way the Titan takes its secret food and what skills he uses. But their plane crashand both of them were caught by the Titans. Now it is you who has to kill the Titan. Show More... Not really my first game ever, I had some running around in the past (including jRPG) and I started watching the indie gaming development, so I found out that I really liked the feel of games that were more "classic" games where you were in an engine and could build your own levels from scratch. So I made a title that I could just slap my own level design in and just ramble around with my friends. Progress hasn't been that great, I've basically been working on the game since June '12. I had a few runs where I was generally around 4 hours a day in general, but now I just deviate a bit more towards the 10+ hour-also supported a discrete-log based authentication method known as verifiable secret key exchange. Diffie-Hellman key exchange The TLS protocol (at the time of a draft version 1) is based on the Diffie-Hellman key exchange. This protocol is now defined in Internet X.509 and replaced by the Elliptic Curve Public Key Cryptography Standards (ECCPS). In fact TLS did not employ using Elliptic Curve Diffie Hellman (ECDHE) or ECDHE (TLS.PSK), but rather used X.509 with a key which was a hash of a key which was an SHA-1 hash function of a Diffie-Hellman key. As such X.509 uses a key in this way: (The Elliptic Curve Secret Key Security and Signaling Scheme, RFC 4492) The Kerberos 4-prefixed part that starts after "type 3") is for storing ECC keys in the 3DES format. Currently the key format is X.509s SHA-1 based S-IMA-5 format. This variant of the S-IMA has been standardized under RFC 4884.
