The diagnosis of periprosthetic joint infection is difficult because of the aseptic loosening of the prosthesis. A correct diagnosis is crucial for further treatment. In a retrospective analysis, the typical radiological signs of PJI according to the CDC and Kettleship criteria after total hip or knee arthroplasty were evaluated to determine the factors that impact the diagnosis. Between 1/2006 and 8/2010, 466 total hip or knee replacements were performed with 179 (38%) revisions within the observation period. A total of 64 revisions with histologically proven periprosthetic infection were identified. In the revision group, 55 PJI were primary and nine were infections due to a prolonged iatrogenic infection. A positive sonication fluid culture was available for 62 of the 64 (96%) cases. On the plain radiographs, the most frequent findings were bone loss and loosening of the acetabular component (35 of 62, 57%) followed by soft-tissue swelling (28 of 62, 44%). Based on the CDC and Kettleship criteria, 48 of the 64 periprosthetic infections (77%) were correctly diagnosed radiologically. The combination of a preoperative positive sonication fluid culture (31 of 62, 50%), a symptomatic history of joint pain (26 of 62, 42%), and radiological signs of loosening (20 of 62, 33%) were the best predictors for the diagnosis. A positive sonication fluid culture or a symptomatic history of joint pain is needed to make a differential diagnosis between aseptic loosening and a periprosthetic infection.
