However you could try the following if you still have your old loader and registry. This video essay provides an overview of the cultural context of Monty Python and the Holy Grail by setting the film in a philosophical analysis of the World, beginning with Aristotle's famous "four causes." An excerpt from Aristotle's Poetics follows. Take a moment to write about the video essay. What did you find most helpful about reading this text? What did you find least helpful? Why do you think this video essay is interesting? EXCERPT from Aristotle's Poetics These various aspects of life... [are] the product of certain natural causes. For all the same things which cause something to be a certain way also cause it to be a certain way not. And from this it follows that it is possible to assign these causes as causes of the differences between those things which are not like themselves. It is also possible to assign these causes as causes of the things which are like themselves, but insofar as they are like in some respect or other, it is possible to assign these causes as causes of both the differences and the likeness in the same respect. The case of the differences in the nature of things is quite plain. For the things which are like themselves as well as the things which are unlike themselves are products of the same cause and of the same thing, either of the same thing itself or of something else, which it causes to be so. The case of the differences in the quality of the things which are like themselves can be dealt with in the same way. All the causes of
