The role of interferons in the natural history of multiple sclerosis. A new therapeutic approach to multiple sclerosis (MS) consists of the sequential use of two biological substances: interferons and oestrogens. The first is an antiviral drug which is able to inhibit the virus release responsible for MS relapses and to control the disease activity in progressive patients. The second represents a drug which reduces the production of interferons and oestrogen receptors to restore the cell-mediated immune response. Interferons exert a direct effect on the course of the disease and can be used alone or combined with corticosteroids. Steroids decrease the interferon plasma levels but do not interfere with their biological activity. The rationale of the combined use of interferons and oestrogens is based on the following evidence: oestrogens increase the interferon plasma levels and suppress the oestrogen receptors in specific regions of the brain; the more specific the areas of the brain for which oestrogens are effective, the more important is the effect exerted by oestrogens. If a significant decrease in relapse rate and in clinical progression of MS is observed, a positive effect on survival is to be expected. Actually, several controlled trials have been performed and oestrogens are able to slow down the progression of the disease in women while
