Lethal phenotypes of Y-linked spermatids in Drosophila melanogaster. Two new lethal Y-linked mutants have been characterized in Drosophila melanogaster. These mutants carry unbalanced recombinant third chromosome sex-chromosomes which express a block of Y-linked spermatid differentiation. The spermatids are completely preformed as determined from the nuclei morphology and the mid-testis localization of the nucleolar protein p80. Other characters, including the ability to express an inbred recombination deficiency, indicate that the Y-chromosome is acting as a simple genetic unit. A small number of nuclei never transcribe a gene for p80 and neither do they undergo DNA synthesis or late stage division, resulting in the formation of giant nuclei. The mutant phenotype is recessive and is not the result of pleiotropy or of abnormally high levels of expression of a gene from the X chromosome.
