Four gastric carcinoid tumors (two from appendix, two from the antrum) were studied by a panel of antibodies including CD56, neuron-specific enolase, CD34, glypican-3, synaptophysin, chromogranin, and serotonin. All tumors were purely epithelial with only focal stromal extension. They had a well-differentiated, trabecular growth pattern. A monotonous population of argyrophilic cells was noted in the stroma of three of the tumors. The cells were generally uniformly immunoreactive for CD56, neuron-specific enolase, glypican-3, and chromogranin, but only rarely were they reactive for synaptophysin. Some of these cells had a vesicular, rhabdoid appearance, with a cytoplasmic inclusions which may be inclusions of the Golgi apparatus. Other cells were immunoreactive for CD34 and showed a plasma cell-like staining. The neuroendocrine nature of the stromal cells with rhabdoid appearance is more likely to be of a neural nature, perhaps cells of the Meissner corpuscle. It remains to be established whether there is a direct origin of the rhabdoid cells from the neuroendocrine-type carcinoid cells. Heparin-induced thrombocytopenia type 2 revisited. Heparin-induced thrombocytopenia (HIT) is the most common of the nonspecific immune thrombocytopenias (ITP). In the past decade, the preferred term was "type 1" HIT (HIT-1), in distinction from the older, clinically less important variant, HIT-2 (HIT2), which was classified as thrombotic thrombocytopenic purpura (TTP) and most recently as consumptive thrombocytopenia. HIT-2 was described in association with at least four medications (heparin, warfarin, enoxaparin, and peg-gabalin). b7e8fdf5c8
