Russell Simmons spends $400,000 of his own money on campaign to decriminalize marijuana in New York City. Marijuana is a taboo subject, but a number of celebrities have spoken out about their personal use and the benefits it brings. Russell Simmons recently donated $400,000 of his own money to a campaign to decriminalize cannabis in New York City. It is the first time that the War on Drugs has been put to referendum in any city. Advertisement The issue has been a hot topic for some time, as the use of marijuana is up for decriminalization in many US states and pot sales have recently been made legal in Canada. Simmons put his money where his mouth was by supporting the Decriminalize NY campaign, which also has the support of former NYC Mayor Michael Bloomberg. It is the first time that the War on Drugs has ever been put to a popular vote in New York City, and the campaign needs 270,000 signatures in order to get on the ballot. It doesn't appear to have a chance of passing, with the latest poll putting the issue at 80 per cent against. Simmons is an investor in the New Jersey marijuana company Storz & Bickel. He is clearly no stranger to the topic of marijuana and has always spoken out about how beneficial it is. His view, that it is a safer drug than alcohol, is backed up by numerous studies. Advertisement As for how he spends his time, Simmons is well known for his lifestyle and is a vocal proponent of staying in shape.

London-based transit company Grab expects its ride-hailing app to be downloaded 200 million times in 2018. The company, which also operates in Southeast Asia, hopes to reach this milestone in the three-to five-year time frame. With time, the company believes Grab will be able to disrupt the taxi industry for clients. Martin Lau, co-founder and CEO, Grab, told CNBC's "Street Signs" that by 2020, the firm will be a "mainstream transportation provider." The ride-hailing app company that is currently in the global spotlight from its acquisition by Chinese internet giant Tencent also has ambitious plans of disrupting the transportation industry. In an exclusive interview with CNBC's "Street Signs" on Thursday, Grab's founder and CEO, Martin Lau, discussed his vision for the company, which has seen incredible growth since it was founded in 2010. "In three to five years, I think we'll be disrupting the taxi industry... We think that the next decade, actually, will be a new era," Lau said. Lau hopes his company can "disrupt the overall long-haul transportation services industry and provide a much more convenient, personalized experience for all the users." But his optimism doesn't go beyond 2018. "In the next three years, we're going to be one of the biggest, largest and most successful transportation companies in the world," he said. "So we have a lot of work to do." Grab has been boosting its presence in North America through partnerships with American ride-hailing giants Uber and Lyft, which have been criticized for a range of issues, including anti-competitive behavior, price gouging, harassment and privacy breaches. "We have a lot of effort in the U.S. to create an impact in the transportation space," Lau said. "But like any platform, we're reaching a maximum when there are that many users on the platform — and we want to take it to the next level." Lau also spoke about how the company plans to make a huge impact in Southeast Asia, where it currently operates. "A lot of people in Southeast Asia are not that familiar with how ride-hailing works," Lau said. "It's a different way of people getting around. But we expect the app to be downloaded 200 million times in 2018." Grab's expansion in Southeast Asia has been running on growth through acquisition, Lau said.
