I'm playing around with javascript and was doing a quiz with data set from W3 school. I've reached the below question. I am asking for help to try and solve it. I'm not sure if this is even possible. I've tried my best. How to use use a variable from a function in another function: var n = 5; function sum (a, b) { return a + b; } function add (a, b) { return a + b; } sum(n, 5); add(n, 5); alert("The answer is " + n + "."); A: You can use this. function sum (a, b) { return a + b; } function add (a, b) { return a + b; } sum(this.n, 5); add(this.n, 5); alert("The answer is " + this.n + "."); A: You want to call functions by reference As per the Stackoverflow guideline DO NOT use global variables Why not use a global variable? I don't recommend using global variables or having code that was called by a function stay in memory after that function returns because of how memory management works (Like when a variable is declared, it doesn't automatically stay in memory forever). Instead, use a global variable to store a value that you want to use in more than one function and then just execute the function whenever you want. var count = 0; var executeCounter = function()
