employees and said it will cut its workforce by nearly one-quarter.

Yahoo laid off the majority of the employees working on the company's social networking service, Tumblr.

The move will save Yahoo up to $75 million in fiscal 2013, Yahoo said. The cuts come on top of layoffs Yahoo made last November, which cut more than 1,000 jobs. Yahoo is also consolidating operations in the United States and Canada, shutting down offices that were previously located in San Jose, Calif., and Vancouver, Canada. The layoffs, which were announced today, primarily affect employees in Yahoo's former finance operation, which includes the search advertising business and online network, although some layoffs will occur in the company's other units, Yahoo said. In addition to Yahoo's layoffs, the company announced that it will not produce advertisements on Tumblr after this quarter. "We plan to spin off the assets of Tumblr into a separate company," Yahoo CEO

Marissa Mayer said in a statement. "This transaction is expected to complete in the first half of 2013 and is subject to regulatory approvals. The separation will also give us the opportunity to focus our efforts on some of the greatest and most strategic opportunities in our business." Yahoo is attempting to separate its core advertising business from the properties that make up its core business. Earlier this month, the company pulled the plug on its $1.1 billion acquisition of the in-development photo sharing service, Flickr, and this week it unveiled plans to sell Yahoo Japan. The layoffs come as the company continues to make wide-ranging cuts to match Wall Street expectations and slash costs. Yahoo has slashed about 12,000 jobs since Mayer took over as CEO in July. Mayer, who came to Yahoo from Google, is trying to turn around the company's search ad business, which has lost market share to Google. It also desperately needs to cut costs after a significant and painful round of layoffs last year cut a third of the workforce. But the company's efforts to separate its core business have been well-publicized. Mayer even promoted the effort during an October conference call, saying that Yahoo's latest acquisition "creates a platform for a full-

---
