The problem of bathing the elderly in bed has existed for years. Unbeknownst to the elderly, it is sometimes necessary for them to be in the shower while laying in bed. This is especially true with bedridden and semi-bedridden patients. Because of this problem, many bathrooms are equipped with a tub. While a bathtub is helpful in that the person does not have to remain in bed while bathing, bathing the elderly person in a bathtub leaves much to be desired because of its lack of height. This often leads to the elderly person being partially or fully submerged in the water. This is not only uncomfortable for the person, but also poses a safety hazard. If left submerged for any extended period of time, the elderly person may drown. In an attempt to remedy this problem, elderly persons living in nursing homes often utilize the nursing home's bathroom facilities. However, bathing an elderly person in a nursing home bathroom often presents a sanitation and infection hazard. This is especially true if the elderly person is not bathed regularly. Further, this situation also creates other problems. For example, the elderly person and the attendant must turn on a water supply and then go about their business, such as a meal or any of the other needs of the elderly person. This is both an inconvenience and a problem for the elderly person. Numerous attempts have been made to solve this problem. A typical solution is to equip the bathroom with a walk-in shower stall that has adjustable height and tilt for the elderly person to bathe in. This device, however, has several drawbacks. First, it is often difficult to raise the shower stall to the required height. Also, there is usually not adequate space to swing a shower curtain or a shower head in the space 6d1f23a050
