A quick question, I have an application with a main form which is opened from a Dialog box. This main form has a public method which is called by a child form (to get a text file from an internet web service). The problem is that everytime i call this method on my main form, the application throw and error saying that the child form have no parent which is known only through the main form. This is a very easy problem to solve using properties, but since i have many methods i had to avoid them. Is there a way to tell the main form that the child form has been created? Regards, A: You could have both MainForm and ChildForm instantiate a third intermediary form(s) that both these forms could refer to. You could then (at any point) switch out your dialog-for-dialog using one for the intermediary form. If you have both forms living in the same class then you can access them without more boilerplate, like this: public partial class MainForm { private ChildForm child = new ChildForm(); public void SomeMethod() { child.SomeMethod(); } // etc. } public partial class ChildForm { private MainForm main = new MainForm(); public void SomeMethod() { main.SomeMethod(); } // etc. } Otherwise, put both of the forms in a base class and access them from the forms that are instantiating them (only the main form would contain the intermediary form): public class ParentForm { private ChildForm 6d1f23a050
