Age-related changes in blood lipids and lipoproteins in male and female rats. The relationship between age and blood lipid and lipoprotein concentrations was studied in 2,976 rats. The mean percent area under the blood lipid and lipoprotein concentration-time curve (AUC) for females was greater than that for males at any age, except at 76 days when there was a significant difference of less than 1.1% among animals of both sexes. The mean percent AUC values of high-density lipoprotein cholesterol (HDL-C) were higher in females than in males of all ages studied. Total cholesterol (TC) of both females and males declined with age; the mean percent AUC of TC for females was 37% and for males 38% at 90 days of age and less than 30% at 230 days. The mean percent AUC of the other lipoproteins measured were: very low-density lipoprotein cholesterol (VLDL-C): 4.6% for females and 5.0% for males; low-density lipoprotein cholesterol (LDL-C): 5.9% for females and 7.3% for males; and of triglyceride (TG): 2.4% for females and 6.9% for males. Blood lipid and lipoprotein concentrations are therefore significantly
