I am sure that you know that Å .The cooling of food and drink is a necessity if high temperature processing is to be avoided. In this respect, several designs of dispensing cups in which different cooling means are provided are known. In general, they comprise an inner container for the liquid and a separate outer container which is detachably and rotatably mounted on the inner container. Thus, a dispensing cup of this kind is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,018,362, wherein the inner container comprises a cylindrical portion and a bottom which projects axially downwards into a chamber defined between the inner and outer container. The cooling means comprises a ring-shaped flange which projects downwards and inwards into the chamber. The cooling means is mounted on the inner container by means of a screw connection. Another design is described in U.S. Pat. No. 4,664,474. In this case, an inner container with a central part and an end portion is provided. The central portion, which is designed as a spherical central part, has the cooling means and is rotatable in an outer container. A further design is described in U.S. Pat. No. 5,431,943. In this case, the cooling means is arranged in an inner container and the latter is detachably mounted on an outer container. U.S. Pat. No. 5,395,106 discloses a cooling means for a cup, wherein the cooling means is manufactured as a so-called "heater collar". This is a component which projects from the external wall of the cup and comprises a plurality of thin metal-foil strips which are electrically connected to each other and have a plurality of, preferably tapered, tubular cavities in the manner of a heat exchanger. The attachment of the heater collar to the cup is effected, for example, by means of glue, adhesive strips or screw connections. The heater collar is arranged in the cup, but in most cases in the lid thereof. An example of a heater collar is described, for example, in WO 97/14209, and this is commercially available as Leukocap from Leukotron Instruments. The heater 6d1f23a050
