Asylum-seekers fleeing from Central and Eastern Europe are now overtaking the flow of refugees from Africa and the Middle East in terms of the magnitude of the influx. The overwhelming majority of the 300,000 asylum-seekers who entered Europe's borders last year were from Syria and Afghanistan. The figures are especially alarming, since Greece is only the first of seven countries in the European Union that are considered to be safe countries for asylum-seekers. Story continues below advertisement Read more: Dutch MP pushes call to tighten European asylum law Greece has admitted to accommodating about 1,100 refugees, and it has repeatedly been criticized for its inadequate response. Asylum-seekers seeking to claim refuge in Greece are routinely detained in isolated Greek islands or in closed-down detention centres. "The Greek government is not following the European Asylum system," said the UNHCR spokesman, William Spindler, in an interview this week. "It's using a quota system, and is deciding who will get refugee status on the basis of their nationality." "Greece's refugee policy is a farce," he added. "Greece's asylum and immigration system operates in a vacuum. It allows anyone to come into the country on the basis that they can get a visa. One of the problems in Europe is that this does not apply to African refugees," he said. We spoke with three Toronto councillors who are close to the issue: Councillors Adam Vaughan (Ward 20, Davenport), James Pasternak (Ward 4, Davenport) and Mike Layton (Ward 19, Trinity-Spadina). All three are deeply involved in the issue, having made numerous trips to the Greek islands. Mr. Vaughan, who spent two days in January in a detention camp on a Greek island,
