CSI Column V8.4.0 13 UPD

any attempt to change the `column.unique` when the column is using a deferred-constructed index, or when the column is using an immediate (``index=true``) and a column-based index is also being used, will raise an exception. insert semantics (i.e. when a `insert()` construct is compiled into a sql string and is then executed on a database using `connection.execute()` or equivalent): a single-row insert statement will be known to produce a new integer primary key value automatically for this column, which will be accessible after the statement is invoked via the `cursorresult.inserted_primary_key` attribute upon the result object. this also applies towards use of the orm when orm-mapped objects are persisted to the database, indicating that a new integer primary key will be available to become part of the identity key for that object. this behavior takes place regardless of what ddl constructs are associated with the column and is independent of the ddl rendering behavior discussed in the previous note above. csi columns, as well as any other data type, can be declared with null values. the null option is useful when defining a column's type or when using the column in queries. null values are represented by the value `null::default` (also known as the default value).

CSI Column V8.4.0 13

The values associated with each unique constraint class or constraint mnemonic key are string naming templates, such as `uq_(table_name)s_(column_0_name)s`, which describe how the name should be composed. The values associated with user-defined unique keys should be callables of the form `fn(constraint, table)`, which accepts the constraint/index object and Table as arguments, returning a string result. As this flag is intended only as a convenience for the common case of adding a single-column, default configured unique constraint to a table definition, explicit use of the UniqueConstraint construct should be preferred for most use cases, including composite constraints that encompass more than one column, backend-specific index configuration options, and constraints that use a specific name. The values associated with each index are string naming templates, such as `uq_(table_name)s_(column_0_name)s_(column_1_name)s`, which describe how the name should be composed. The values associated with user-defined index keys should be callables of the form `fn(constraint, index)`, which accepts the constraint/index object and Index as arguments, returning a string result.
