the second bonus level is set on a different scenario and is identical to the first, except that the controls (brakes, levers etc) are opposite. it gets worse - they are reversed - all player mechanics are reversed. the game mechanics appear to be identical, thus code to navigate the game will allow a player to finish the game. in addition, if you use a code to open the second level, you will immediately take yourself to a game mechanics tutorial for a new set of controls, leaving the player no indication of what they need to do. the third bonus level is set on a different scenario and is identical to the first, except that the controls (brakes, levers etc) are reversed. it gets worse - they are reversed - all player mechanics are reversed. the game mechanics appear to be identical, thus code to navigate the game will allow a player to finish the game. in this level you have to reverse the game mechanics - that's harder than it sounds, and most players will not find it at all intuitive and will throw up their hands in frustration. in addition, if you use a code to open the third level, you will immediately take yourself to a game mechanics tutorial for a new set of controls, leaving the player no indication of what they need to do. the first bonus level is set on a different scenario and is identical to the first, except that the controls (brakes, levers etc) are opposite. it gets worse - they are reversed - all player mechanics are reversed. the game mechanics appear to be identical, thus code to navigate the game will allow a player to finish the game.

◆◆ By now we know that Massachusetts gave the state's highest education ranking to one school that was not under investigation for cheating. It took months for the truth to come out, but now we know that Rice University, the first-ranked school in the nation, was the school that broke the state's academic integrity system and posed as a student named Henry Louis Gates at Harvard. Here is the full explanation of the scandal from Harvard's own website: The senior class visit program is an annual program sponsored by Harvard College that allows incoming students to visit a variety of houses on campus. The program offers excellent contact with upperclass students and those who help to define Harvard's academic identity. In 2011, students from Harvard, Yale, Rice, Princeton, and Stanford visited 11 Harvard Houses. The 2010 program was the first, and hence there was no set structure for how the visiting program would work. The 2011 program was a little less amorphous than previous years, in that the houses which were chosen were the ones which had student communities that had traditionally been underserved by visiting programs and the most prominent student communities within each. Thus, the idea was that the participants would be mostly upperclass students who might be less accepting of outsiders than their peers who had never visited. It was recognized that this kind of interaction might feel strange and uncomfortable to some students. The visiting program coordinator at the time had been assigned to make plans to host the visiting program participants in a way that would maximize the degree of interaction and variety. In addition, it was anticipated that students from programs that had not traditionally hosted visiting programs would want to take part in a visiting program, and that therefore the houses chosen would have an opportunity to welcome such visitors. In November 2011, the visiting program coordinator learned that an incoming student identified only as “Henry Louis Gates,” had approached his supervisor to ask to participate in the visiting program, was denied entry, and made a complaint to the Dean. The visiting program coordinator immediately advised all student groups to exercise caution and skepticism in the handling of strangers who sought to participate in the visiting program. He reiterated to his senior staff the importance of being vigilant in the face of any potential impropriety. Since this incident, the visiting program coordinator has been working with faculty and senior staff to strengthen the support that the visiting program receives from the individual houses, and in the houses and the senior staff to maximize the awareness of the importance of an ethical approach to student interaction. 5ec8ef588b
