this story is not quite accurate. the validation server has been set to check drives at the end of the day, but it is a valid license and the drive will not be disabled. once the validity of a key has been validated, it is non-deletable. disabling a license requires changing a setting and then entering the license key directly for validation. the product key is removed and the license validity will be checked on the next login or when the drive is powered on. the method we described makes sense for limiting activation. i think that there is more to it than simply contacting the validation server, it may also require the validation server to disable the activation key. any suggestions as to how to contact the validation server?

ok.. i checked the link you provided and it is true that security key is not dell specific. so in other words if i bought my pc from any company other than dell would the pc be non-genuine. even though the original purchase was from dell. we have updated our licensing pages to help make it easier to determine if a key is dell specific. if the system is genuine, it has a certificate of authenticity (coa) with a serial number on it. coa numbers are 15 characters long and can be validated using a coa validator. coas are available for genuine windows oem products and can be generated by a windows 10 client. if you purchase a reinstallation dvd, the coa is not required. its never advisable to run an untested operating system. if a key is not dell specific, and you know for sure it is genuine, contact the validation server for instructions.

system was working fine and all of the sudden could not connect to the internet. googled it for hours and figured it could be everything from a bad update to a virus, etc. i used the malwarebytes live scan and found the last update microsoft security essentials was on november 13th. it reported every update but it looked like the nov 13th update was critical and the other updates didn't really matter since it was already up-to-date. unplugged the computer, turned it back on, waited about 2 hours and tried reconnecting to the internet and could not. restarted it and could not connect to the internet again. so i restarted the computer, turned off wi-fi, then when i turned the computer back on, i wasn't able to connect to the internet. i ran another malwarebytes live scan and everything checked out except for malwarebytes anti-malware telling me there was an update. i ran the update and restarted and that got rid of the error message. i could not see any difference except that it was downloading and updating all of the items listed in the malwarebytes anti-malware scan. a month ago it was working perfectly fine and i do not recall doing anything differently that could have caused this problem. now it will not connect to the internet even though it has internet access. the machine is a lenovo t400 laptop with windows 10 ultimate installed. the lack of internet access is the only issue, and it is limited to just this machine. it will connect to the wireless network, it will connect to a wired network, and it will connect to a wifi hot spot.

however, it will not connect to the internet. what can be done? i've tried every trick i can think of and nothing has worked. 5ec8ef588b
