We discern no abuse of discretion in the trial court's modification of the previously issued decree. Regarding the trial court's conclusion that Mother was entitled to $3,500 in cash rather than medical insurance, and that Father did not need to begin paying Mother $60 per month in child support until the resolution of the conflict, we note the following: It is well settled that a trial court may, and in some circumstances should, modify a provision of a permanent final decree if there has been a substantial and continuing change in circumstances that was not contemplated at the time the original decree was entered. Rather than amending the decree, a trial court may modify the original decree by simply clarifying the original decree to resolve a discrepancy regarding a provision that is not ambiguous but whose interpretation is unclear. Where the trial court amends a provision of a permanent final decree, the amendment is considered substantive and retroactive support may be ordered. The trial court's authority in this regard is intended to be a partial rather than complete remedy; the partial modification of the order will be given retroactive effect only so far as the need for modification could have
