The multinucleated giant cells that form in some fibrosarcomas are interesting because of their presumed role in fibrosis. Of particular interest is the potential role of the macrophage in giant cell formation and the potential role of macrophage cytokine release in this process. To determine if macrophage-conditioned medium has an effect on fibroblast-like cell properties, the HT-1080 human fibrosarcoma cell line was tested. Conditioned medium from CD68+ macrophages was found to have an effect on the HT-1080 cells. These effects included an apparent increase in cell spreading, a decrease in motility, the appearance of actin stress fibers, and the formation of elongated cell processes (or fibroblast-like extensions). This demonstrates that macrophages can influence the behavior of fibroblasts through the release of growth and motility-inhibitory cytokines.
