The prior art includes numerous disclosures of devices for clamping two pieces together that are to be welded, soldered, crimped, or otherwise clamped or secured together. Typically, a male or female nut is received on a threaded post or "stud" of one of the pieces of material to be clamped, and a compression plate is positioned over the other piece. In particular, welding is typically performed at a fixed location, such as over one of the male or female nuts, and the stud is then moved as required from one location to another. Examples of such devices are shown in U.S. Pat. Nos. 3,097,803; 3,154,288; 3,587,779; 3,621,861; 3,665,701; 3,798,953; 3,802,580; 3,929,319; 4,021,863; 4,029,581; 4,149,241; 4,273,141; and 4,631,916. U.S. Pat. No. 4,022,224 discloses a soldering tool having a resilient clamping arrangement which is remotely activated by an eccentric actuator rod. U.S. Pat. No. 4,865,078 discloses a clamping apparatus for clamping two large diameter rod members together, the members being intended for use in many different applications, such as in the construction of oil, gas, and petroleum piping systems. The apparatus includes a biasing means, such as a compression spring, which is integral with an eccentric to provide pressure on a gudgeon-shaped clamping arm. The eccentric is rotated about a concentric pivot which is provided on a joint member. However, this mechanism is not suitable for handling smaller diameter pieces such as those used in the fabrication f988f36e3a
