I used to be a fan of Ice cream, but after I had to join the real world, I Swiss commuters are set to pay 10 times more for petrol in the coming years as they are forced to buy it again at the pump to finance the costs of replacing ageing fuel tanks. A diesel motorist would on average pay 478 Swiss francs a year to fill the tank with fuel, according to research by thinktank Future Climate. Swiss motorists buy far less petrol than in most other European countries. About 6.6m litres were bought in the year to September 2015, according to OPEC, compared with an average of almost 30m litres a day across the EU. The country imports much of its fuel. The prices at the pump are already rising by around 20% a year. The Climate Saver fund-raising initiative, which began in France on Saturday, was launched by the NGO Environnement Viel and looks to raise money for the Energy Foundation, an energy research organisation, which has a program that aims to stimulate the car industry to look for fuel alternatives. "Car owners are paying the full price of petrol because of the low quantity used," Pierre Ziegler, a spokesman for Environnement Viel, told the Guardian. "In a country like Switzerland, petrol represents 55% of our oil use. We must have a very strong intervention by the state to have time to adapt our cars to more sustainable energies." Relying on imported oil has a downside too. There is a huge oilfield off the Greenland ice cap, and it is believed to produce up to 6,000-7,000 barrels a day. The whole of Switzerland can be served from it, while the surrounding countries are not big enough to hold it all. Concerns have been raised over the oil used to heat the country's very cold homes, which can cause greenhouse gas emissions, even though the country has set an example for the rest of Europe by becoming a net exporter of electricity. Noel Gatt, of the foundation, said: "The
