I know that this is a well-known issue with this software, but I was trying to find out what was going on. I did some research to try to find an answer, but I couldn't find one. I took a screenshot of what I was talking about and showed it to my friend, and he said it was normal behavior. I begged him to tell me what was going on so that I could solve my problem. But he refused to tell me anything because it wasn't a bug. He just said that I was crazy because, in a way, this behavior is normal in Adobe Photoshop.

Is this bad for Adobe, who are dependent on users using their software and making it better? Yes, and Adobe will do some serious work fixing its issues. Is PS at fault, and could it be fixed? Yes, absolutely. It is at the user's request that Adobe offers the flexibility of use that see in Lightroom. I already used to think that Photoshop was annoying and slow - but even that's not a problem I can't overlook, because I make a living at this. So, what can we do to improve it? For myself, it means I will more than likely wait for the next update to Photoshop, which will be known some time soon. Even then, I'm not sure how much I will use it for the foreseeable future. On a positive note: Right now, Lightroom has a huge lead on Adobe's software. In fact, contrary to Lee's article, I reckon that is has been the case forever. I can't help but wonder why Adobe want to "challenge" Lightroom in such a disrespectful fashion - in fact against the very ideals and goals the community has continually championed. If you haven't upgraded to the next version of your program in a long time, you'll be surprised at what a few years will do to a program. Phasing out old functions and updating all the old functions in one fell swoop does make it very easy to pick up where you left off, and in no time, be using a rich new program. All the features old versions had will be the same or just as good in the new version. Unless that new version contains a feature you need, that is.
