Lightroom 5 is packed with snazzy new features. Its integration into Bridge is extremely tight. Adding photos from Bridge to the initial catalog is as simple as selecting the Bridge photos and pressing the button. The "Add All" option adds all the photos in your Bridge albums by default. There's a PRO version of Lightroom Theme that also integrates well with ADOBE STUDIO. As far as image editing options and features go, Lightroom is moving up because of what it can do with previously unuseable raw data. For example, you can now add raw data straight from your digital camera to a Lightroom catalog. Adobe's changes to the RAW Processor also makes Lightroom compatible with DNG raw data files from modern digital cameras. Raw data can now be later edited in Lightroom along with other image data. Lightroom 5 adds screen shots, annotations, and the ability to rename collections directly in the workspace. With the same screen shots, you can create an annotation list that includes a screen shot and a brief description of each item. Or you can create multiple screens at once, accented by several different emoticons. Lightroom 5 brings with it the latest versions of Adobe's DNG-style raw processing engine. It's accessible from within the program, where it can be used to process RAW files in the same way as it does JPEGs, TIFFs, and JPEGs. Lightroom 5 also brings with it the latest versions of Adobe's raw processing engine. It's accessible from within the program, where it can be used to process RAW files in the same way as it does JPEGs, TIFFs, and JPEGs. Lightroom 5 actually encourages use of this new engine. It includes more raw files than ever before: up to 42 RAW files compared to 13 JPEGs that was a previous Lightroom maximum.

Screen shots Raw files can now be rendered in screen shots you take in Adobe Bridge or using the View > Screen Shots command. To see the screen shots, you need to open the screen's metadata window in the Layers panel. This includes a screen shot of the actual photo and a screen shot of the layers within the photo. There is also a button that will render a screen shot of ALL the layers within the photo.

Annotation and Renaming Collections The new Collections feature Twist allows you to rename collections directly from within the workspace.

For the past few years, the future of the web has been an exciting mystery to all because browsers are constantly changing, and even the existing APIs fail to adhere to the constantly changing security standards. These days, we are in a situation where the web is in its renaissance as a robust, robust, and a secure ecosystem that is significantly richer than what it used to be and still, it has no native development capabilities. The web vendors hope that this is going to be the beginning of the end for their expensive proprietary solutions. But how far can the web go without native APIs? Today, we're announcing a new role at Adobe that will make it possible to take advantage of the coming wave of innovation in the web ecosystem — including native browser development — without waiting for browser vendors to shape the platform on their terms. We are announcing the Web Platform team, who will be working on the technologies we need to achieve that goal. And today, we're taking a first step toward this new role by making an open-source bridge API available with the initial release of the Workbox JavaScript library. Adopting Workbox will enable developers to take advantage of the emerging browser ecosystem in their applications. We want to prevent the next Flash from happening over and over again. That is how we got the infamous "Flash of Invisible text and buttons" demo; where a static, entirely-invisible web page was boosted by the high pop-up and scrolling rates to become an effective demonstration of how Flash was never really replaced by the web. e3d0a04c9c
