Well, as I pointed out before, Adobe Lightroom 5.2 was released recently, and it had so many amazing features. To be very honest, I barely felt the lack of a designer. The UI is completely now. So, what do I find in Lightroom 5.2? First, I get the following message when I open: "Lightroom 5.2 runs on all platforms, including Windows Phone 8." So, I got to know about the recent Windows Phone 8 release (Developing apps and web applications for Windows 8, Windows Phone 8 camera) and then I thought to myself – "Hey! Why not get the mobile version of Lightroom too?" Then I found that the mobile version is now available in the App Store completely free and that is exactly what I did. You need to have an iPhone or iPad to download and use it. We've recently upgraded and moved to Lightroom 5.2 because most of our reps use it (only 2 use Photoshop for editing). We just finished a 12 page brochure with Tumbrl for our corporate website. We had no experience shooting without flash, but the download of Tumbrl was simple and we were all able to use it. The only negative of using Lightroom 5.2 (and I'm sure of this) is that some of the camera control sliders don't work on the iPhone, and that was the only issue we had. Tom We upgraded to Lightroom 5.2 so that we can use the mobile version for iPad. However I think the rapid improvement shown by Lightroom is not because of the Adobe engineers but is a result of the people working on the product. The UI improvements are visible in the version 5, but the changes in the camera controls on the virtual horizon, etc., were displayed in the 3 version 4.50.5. There are also some performance improvements that have been measured and I am sure Adobe Photoshop engineers have improved it as well. I feel that it is not easy to create a product like the Lightroom. As you can see after a few months of version 5.2 many of the problems are solved and the time devoted to solving some issues is much shorter than previous version.
