Those being said, there is one thing that I really cannot stand and that is that every new version of Lightroom creates a video tutorial to teach you how to use the features, even though you may have used them time and again in previous versions. Added further irritation is that the location of the video tutorial is in a place where you have to look for it each time, even if you are already familiar with some of the features. I also think that the tutorial should be, by default, an option rather than one that you set after using the app. It would only take a few seconds for the operating system to change to an option, create a new window to the tutorial, and then close it. As it is, users on a Mac must Alt-click on the camera icon in the Dock, which is only an option at the command line, as well. The worst part is that when you close the new video window, it completely removes the place in Lightroom where the tutorial could be found. I believe that having a video tutorial open all the time makes Lightroom cumbersome, since I am always checking and clicking on the tutorial and closing it. If the program wanted me to see the tutorial, it could have just called it up each time I open the View Options pane. The previous problem is partly solved by the Refresh function, which is found in Edit and also in File. When you press the F5 key, your view will refresh automatically. Press the Ctrl+E or the F11 key to exit the tutorial. When you start a new project, however, you see a drop down box offering only either the tutorial or refresh. There is no way to turn off the tutorial. In other words, you always start with a tutorial. For the love of all that is holy, please allow us to turn off the tutorial. If I have to choose between showing something or doing something extra work, I would always choose doing something extra work.
