The new Dreamweaver does have some cool features. The tag cloud in the left sidebar on a page is pretty cool, and Dreamweaver will even help you with other HTML elements (some of which may well be unrecognized by other web browsers)? The groundbreaking feature of Dreamweaver is Modal Dialogues. You can drag and drop a webpage directly into a dialog box. The dialog box is created in real time, and you can then adjust the layout and content using the Modal Dialogues of your choosing. The dialog window keeps a session alive if you open and close the dialog box. If you want to explore the dialog box, simply place your cursor somewhere inside it, click anywhere, and the dialog box reopens. It supports responsive design, and it's very powerful and intuitive. Let's see how it works to create a simple form — Add a modal dialogue window to your page by selecting "modal dialog" from the drop down menu in the toolbar and then dragging the page to the window. You can drag from top to bottom in the list or just about any position, in other words. When you're done, return to your normal working document by selecting your "Normal" workspace from the top toolbar and then choosing the "Default" workspace in the left drop down menu on the toolbar. You will see a "Preview" of the modal dialog in the black space at the top of the white space of your document. You are no longer restricted to working with individual files. Since your document is being viewed and modified within another application (for example, Photoshop), you can experiment with different behaviors, but still work with the original in the proper workspace.
