Processing files in Lightroom is fast and effective. You can do a lot of your editing, cleaning, cropping and color adjustment within the software without going back to Photoshop. However, when it's time to save to the web, a standard or even a high-res file, another application is needed. That's when you might need Photoshop. I love most the ability to make things much easier by simply clicking on a ruler or a combination of layers. In the past I had to refer to the Photoshop big book to figure out how to work things. Now I just use my mouse click to get things done. Photoshop gives you the ability to crop pictures to a specific size. If the idea of fitting an entire Fortune 500 photograph inside a postage stamp appeals to you, you'll want Photoshop. You can expedite the process for less experienced users by using the Rotate to Crop tool to turn a square into a circle. But if you use the Rotate to Crop tool to create a perfect circle, well, it can take hours. When it's done, you have to paint around elements of the original image, such as the menus, and then paste them to the new space. Small mistakes can cause you to have to repeat this process multiple times. And prepare to deal with an image that is larger than needed. But if you create the image in this way, it has the exact size you want. Alas, while you think you're doing this fun exercise, the editing software is basically creating a completely new image, using the edits you've made. This isn't a fast process.
